Training

Unit 1 · 1.3.4.2 Managing people

Training develops employees' skills. The three main types:

- Induction — for new staff: introduces the business, people, procedures and health & safety so they settle in quickly.
- On-the-job — learning while doing the real role, from experienced colleagues. Cheap and practical, but can pass on bad habits and distract the trainer.
- Off-the-job — learning away from work (college course, external specialist). Better for complex/specialist skills, but costs more and the worker is off the job.

Training raises productivity, quality, motivation and retention, but it is a cost: replacing and retraining staff can run to thousands per worker, so firms weigh the spend against a more skilled, loyal workforce.
